USPA NEWS - Selected for Directors' Fortnight, Brazilian directors Eryk Rocha and Gabriela Carneiro da Cunha's "The Falling Sky", documents the powerful testimony of Davi Kopenawa, shaman and leader of the Amazonian Yanomami people as he performs the reahu ritual, a shamanistic ceremony mobilizing the community in a collective effort to hold up the sky and prevent it from falling. Through the reahu, the film addresses the destruction of the Yanomami's way of life caused by the intrusions of the napë, the white prospectors and the so-called civilized world into the Yanomami territory.

"The Falling Sky" by Eryk Rocha and Gabriela Carneiro da Cunha about the Yanomami people to celebrate its world premiere in Directors' Fortnight at the Cannes Film Festival

In spellbinding images of this rite central to the Yanomami identity, the film transmits the beauty of Yanomami cosmology and the strength of their geopolitical vision that invites us to take a deep look at our own future. Shaman Davi Kopenawa: "The forest is alive. It will only die if the whites continue to destroy it. (...) Then we will die, one after the other, both we and the white people. All shamans will eventually die. When there are no more living ones to support the sky, it will collapse."

In Brazil, about 30,000 indigenous Yanomami currently live in more than 300 communities. They are facing a severe humanitarian crisis caused by the massive invasion of miners in search of metals, mainly gold and tin. In recent years, the number of invaders has reached about 20,000, fostering violence, mercury contamination of water and fish, deforestation.

Davi Kopenawa, shaman and spokesperson for the Yanomami, states: "The Falling Sky shows the people in the city our work, which is different, which doesn't harm the forest, doesn't harm our mother earth. This way, future generations will continue to listen to our speech. It shows the force of mother earth to the people in the city so they can respect her."

Co-director Eryk Rocha adds: "We are overjoyed to premiere our film at Director's Fortnight at the Cannes Film Festival, a historically fertile and combative space for thinking and transcending cinema and the world. It will be an incredible chance to see and hear the dream, emotion and struggle of the Yanomami explode on the screen, letting the melody of the 'polyglot forest' and its songs echo along with the precise and trenchant thought of Davi Kopenawa, who brings together the indigenous peoples and the Yanomami as a cosmological and geopolitical force."

Co-director Gabriela Carneiro da Cunha comments: "The Falling Sky is the cinematographic expression of a relationship, of the enchantment we had when reading Davi and Bruce's book, certainly, but mainly of what was experienced in flesh, blood and spirit over the last 7 years of our relationship with Davi Kopenawa, the village of Watorik? and the Yanomami. It's a film where the camera doesn't just look at the Yanomami, but at us non-indigenous people too."

The film, directed by Eryk Rocha and Gabriela Carneiro da Cunha, is freely based on the homonymous book by Yanomami Davi Kopenawa and French anthropologist Bruce Albert and results from a thirty-year relationship between the two. The Falling Sky is a Brazilian/Italian co-production between ARUAC FILMES, Hutukara Yanomami Association and Stenal Entertainment with Rai Cinema, in collaboration with Les Films d'Ici.
